The doctrine emphasized the interconnectedness of all living beings and the universe as a whole. It promoted the idea that energy and consciousness intertwined to create a harmonious existence. Believers sought to tap into this universal energy to enhance their own lives and manifest their desires.

While the doctrine of 1910 encompassed a wide range of beliefs, one central tenet was the existence of a higher power or divine being. However, rather than subscribing to a specific religious dogma, individuals were encouraged to explore their own interpretations of spirituality. This open-mindedness allowed for a diverse range of practices and rituals to emerge.

Rituals and Practices

The rituals and practices of 1910 were intricately woven into the fabric of daily life. They served as a way to connect with the divine and harness the power of the universe. These rituals varied across cultures and regions, reflecting the diversity of beliefs and traditions prevalent at the time.

One popular ritual was the "Spiritual Gathering." People would come together in sacred spaces, often in nature, to meditate, share insights, and collectively raise their vibrations to higher frequencies. These gatherings were seen as a way to connect with like-minded individuals, allowing for the exchange of ideas and experiences.

Another common practice was the use of affirmations and visualizations to manifest desires. Believers would repeat positive statements, known as affirmations, to reprogram their subconscious minds and attract abundance. Visualizations played a key role in this process, as individuals would vividly imagine themselves achieving their goals, thus magnetizing those experiences into their reality.

Astrology and numerology were also highly regarded during this era. The alignment of celestial bodies was believed to influence the moods and energies of individuals. Likewise, numbers were thought to carry specific vibrations and meanings, allowing practitioners to gain insight into their personal destinies.
