The Laughing Child

W. S. Merwin, 1927

When she looked down from the kitchen window into the back yard and the brown wicker baby carriage in which she had tucked me three months old to lie out in the fresh air of my first January the carriage was shaking she said and went on shaking and she saw I was lying there laughing she told me about it later it was something that reassured her in a life in which she had lost everyone she loved before I was born and she had just begun to believe that she might be able to keep me as I lay there in the winter laughing it was what she was thinking of later when she told me that I had been a happy child and she must have kept that through the gray cloud of all her days and now out of the horn of dreams of my own life I wake again into the laughing child
