

How a Letter To Mrs. Roosevelt Changed History Forever

onto Maple Avenue. Papa would climb down the steps, then hold out his hand to Mama. I could tell right then if Charlie—he's my little brother—had had a good day or bad.

Charlie had been kicked in the knee when he'd tried to break up a fight between two boys during a game of kickball. He'd convinced Mama and Papa that it was an accident, but I was not so sure. I can remember hearing Charlie groan during the night. I went in to check him, but he was sound asleep. The next morning Charlie's knee looked like a balloon. He stayed in bed all day. It didn't help. When the doctor visited that evening he told Papa to get Charlie to the hospital immediately. The infection in Charlie's knee bone was called osteomyelitis.

Every day for four months Mama and Papa rode the trolley to Mercy Hospital to visit Charlie. Every night for four months I waited for their return.

I was seven. The hospital rules posted in the front lobby said I was too young to visit my brother. That's why I stayed home, although Sister Cecilia did sneak me up to the third-floor children's ward to see Charlie one time. It was in January, right after Charlie's accident. She held her arm out to Mama as if she was guiding her through the halls, and hid me between the folds of the long, draping sleeve of her habit. She told me that two things were certain: if we could get past Mother Superior it would be a miracle, and

It was a time of uncertainty and despair as the Great Depression gripped the United States in its ironclad grip. The year was 1933, and as households struggled to make ends meet, one remarkable woman rose above the adversity to create a lasting impact on the lives of ordinary individuals. This is the captivating story of a letter that was written to Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, the First Lady of the United States, that ultimately changed history forever.

The Controversial Beginning

In the midst of the Great Depression, poverty reached unprecedented levels, affecting people from all walks of life. It was during this time that a humble factory worker named Sarah Johnson found herself compelled to write a letter to Mrs. Roosevelt, pouring out her anguish and pleading for help. Little did she know that her heartfelt words would grab the attention of the First Lady and ignite a series of events that would alter the course of American history.
