

The Professional Faculty And Graduate Consultant Guide To Writing Centers

A Valuable Resource for Writers

Writing centers are often considered the hidden gems of educational institutions. They are purposefully designed to assist students and writers in the development of their writing skills. From undergraduates struggling with research papers to professional faculty members polishing their academic articles, writing centers provide a wide range of services to cater to the diverse needs of their patrons. In this guide, we will explore the essential elements of a writing center and discuss how both professional faculty and graduate consultants can benefit from this valuable resource.

The Anatomy of a Writing Center

A writing center typically consists of a physical location on campus where individuals can seek writing assistance, as well as a team of experienced consultants who provide guidance and feedback on various aspects of writing. The consultants are trained to assist writers in all stages of the writing process, including brainstorming, outlining, drafting, and revising. They offer suggestions for improving sentence structure, grammar, style, and overall content. Additionally, writing centers often provide resources such as writing manuals, grammar handbooks, and online tools to aid writers in their self-improvement.

Services for Professional Faculty

While writing centers are primarily known for helping students, they also offer valuable services for professional faculty members. Faculty can benefit from writing center consultations by receiving feedback on grant proposals, research articles, and conference papers. Writing center consultants are skilled in identifying areas that may require further development, such as clarity of argument, organization of ideas, or effective use of evidence. By availing themselves of the writing center's expertise, faculty members can enhance the quality and impact of their scholarly work.

The Role of Graduate Consultants

Graduate consultants play a crucial role in writing centers. They are often advanced students who have demonstrated excellence in their own writing and possess the skills necessary to guide others. These consultants undergo extensive training in composition theory, peer tutoring, and effective communication. By working closely with graduate consultants, faculty members can tap into their fresh perspectives and knowledge, gaining valuable insights into teaching writing to students in their respective disciplines.

Collaborative Learning Opportunities

Writing centers foster an environment of collaborative learning, where consultants and writers work together to improve the quality of writing. This collaboration not only benefits individual writers but also contributes to the overall writing culture of the institution. Faculty members who engage with writing centers can develop effective pedagogical strategies, access valuable resources, and participate in professional development opportunities related to writing instruction. This reciprocal relationship between faculty and writing centers helps create an inclusive educational community focused on promoting strong writing skills across disciplines.

Writing centers are critical resources for both students and faculty members seeking to improve their writing skills. By utilizing the expertise of writing center consultants, faculty members can enhance the quality of their scholarly work and develop effective writing pedagogies. Graduate consultants, with their specialized training, bring fresh insights and perspectives to the table. So, whether you are an aspiring writer, a seasoned faculty member, or a graduate consultant, make sure to take advantage of the valuable resources provided by writing centers in order to achieve your writing goals.

Redefining Roles is the first book to recognize and provide sustained focus on the presence of professional, faculty, and graduate student consultants in writing centers. A significant number of writing centers employ non-peer consultants, yet most major training manuals are geared toward undergraduate tutoring practices or administrators. This collection systematically addresses this gap in the literature while initiating new conversations regarding writing center staffing.

Thirty-two authors, consultants, and administrators from diverse centers—from large public four-year institutions to a private, online for-profit university—provide both theoretical frameworks and practical applications in eighteen chapters. Ten chapters focus on graduate consultants and address issues of authority, training, professional development, and mentoring, and eight focus on professional and faculty consultant training as well as specific issues of identity and authority. By sharing these voices, Redefining Roles broadens the very idea of writing centers while opening the door to more dialogue on the important role these practitioners play.

Redefining Roles is designed for writing center practitioners, scholars, and staff. It is also a necessary addition to help campus administrators in the ongoing struggle to validate the intellectually complex work that such staff performs.
